Heck, I even have written a review for you. Apart from the regular setup and room for improvement, or lack of improvements, there is nothing that has to be said in favour of Lightroom. As long as you do not use advanced photo editing functions, Lightroom is free. There you go. Of course, because there are a lot of features that are similar to those in Photoshop, you'd think that there are so many features that one notes down. But on the contrary, there are hardly any features that stand out. Adobe has done a major overhaul of their software and put in so many concepts that they are trying to catch up with the rest of the newcomers in the photo editing business. After all, they have earned the right to provide a wide variety of gadgets for photo editing purposes and almost all the manufacturers have caught up with the latest and greatest in photography. The problem with fast apps like Photoshop, or Adobe Air, is that they look really cool when they are running and really sluggish when you are done with them. I mean that for something like Photoshop.. I have never used it but I have used Dreamweaver and some other similar things and it always looks nice when it is running.. the moment I have to use them and manipulate the contents inside of them they are pretty crappy and when I have finished with them and start looking at them they are even worse. It just looks ugly. This application is not suitable for PC users. Users with Android phones should know that apps can intercept their phone calls, write to their contacts, read files on their phone, and send SMS messages - all without the user knowing about it! Thus, a savvy user should not let a developer or app on their phone see your phone number; users can easily change their number to any other number, and see if any spam messages appear in their phone.

Only PC users can upload files such as office documents and PDFs.

Users play store games via a third party, not their own phone, although certain phone-based games can show up on "profiles".
